California is studying a new way for funding our transportation system, through a road charge pilot program. The road charge pilot program officially launched on July 1, 2016, but there still is time to be part of the study. Caltrans is offering you the opportunity to sign up for the pilot and pass along this message to your coworkers, family and friends.

Pilot participants will not actually pay a road charge while participating in the pilot. Instead, they will make simulated payments based on how far they drive. The pilot offers several options for participants to report their mileage, including six different low-to-high tech methods:

Time Permit

“Purchase” a permit for unlimited road use in California for a specific period of time

Mileage Permit

“Purchase” a block of miles based on your expected use of California’s roads

Odometer Charge

“Make payments” based on periodic manual odometer readings

Plug-in Device (Location Optional)

Report miles using a plug-in device for your car with optional smartphone app

Smartphone App (Location Optional)

Report miles using a smartphone app

Car’s Built-in Technology

Report using your car’s built-in technology (only available in select, recent models)
